religion... then again, their religion probably includes magic. i probably wouldn't live there but i might go there for medical reasons. also, something something their economics is just neoliberal regulatory capitalism but without the corporate entities strongarming the system towards their own ends while putting on a façade of being under the proposed law (or even against it), going as far as starting wars to gain further power and wealth. or in other words, not particularly interesting from a story perspective, but better than what we have here in the real world.

On a serious note though, I found it quite interesting that the BCS is considering using modern steal engines. I don't know if that particular factbook i outdated or historical in concept, but the idea was good overall, and I enjoyed the contents, haha. Just a very interesting idea for a nation in an era of resource scarcity.

Okay, so firstly I just wanna mention how cool it is that you've got bioluminescent bunnies who use it to further their communicative abilities, but that's more of a little tidbit I think, so what I really found interesting is the degree of democratic hierarchy which the UCBR operates under, and the size of some of the institutions is just really cool. Other than that, I think the question as to the true level of democracy which they claim is an interesting point of view which I feel most nations would overlook.

Despite Titoism being an ideology known for its independence and neutrality during the cold war, Yugoslavia - which is still Titoist - has joined the Warsaw pact. The same pact that includes Bulgaria, a nation that has annexed Macedonia.

How they got a Titoist nation to not only join the Warsaw Pact, but join the Warsaw Pact after losing 10% of its land area and 6.0% of its population to another nation within it, I don't know. But I can only presume Yugoslavia is not happy about it.

They seem to be composed of an Alliance of Republics, Dictatorships, Communes and other nations seemingly to fight against a so called 'Democratic World Order' But as to why they are in such an alliance is confusing.

So from what I've gathered about Big Sky, the etymology of such a nation is quite literal in its meaning, as it references the open, beautiful skies of Montana which is quite known for its natural beauty. There seems to be a trend for the Montanan population to name their state to accurately depict its environmental features while also treading in the dangerous territory of how names could end up being seen as claims to certain parts of land. I assume the logic behind the naming of Big Sky is because of the fact that no one can truly 'claim' the sky.

Looking over at Darien, I realize just how much of a hotbed world politics is in ASDT's world, mainly due to the fact that in this world, there is a point of divergence where Europe has its own agenda and isn't in the same umbrella as the US. What a mess but with so many parties involved in South America, I can imagine there to be no shortage of opportunity for warfare and political friction to thrive in. I can't imagine that any authority in Southern and Central America would last long without having its authority challenged by the pawns of the world's superpower. Darien remains strong by being an alliance between a civilian government and a criminal syndicate. It's funny to see them have such a cooperative and beneficial agreement with one another, exploiting the world's chaos in a realistic fashion that seems to help Darien stay afloat in the best way possible, although of course, there's always a catch when allying with criminals.

AN: They seem to be a semi-Democratic empire consisting of two empires that have fused in the hopes that their resulting combined pool of resources and manpower will somehow pave the way for unity in the world. They seem to be an executive monarchy as while they have democracy, the monarchs have much legal power.
