Benevolent Dictatorship

by Castelia » Sun Apr 19, 2020 1:16 am

QUOTE

"I do not believe that any machine can ever replace an organic in the role of leadership, because an organic possesses the ability to judge beyond just the logical. Some things cannot be solved by mere logic alone, solutions to those types of problems need the heart. I am thus thoroughly disgusted with The Paramount and its leadership of its nation. Removing all kinds of freedom and rights while forcing its people into conformity is a barbarous idea, the kind that we Castelians have grown beyond. We may discriminate against those foreign to us, but we at least have the generosity to grant them the choice to join us or not. If they wish to remain in their barbarism, we will allow their choice, as any educated gentleman would respect the choice of a peasant.

My overall assessment of this leader is extremely negative."

"I've got to admire this guy for most of his policies. It's not often that one learns to enact various reforms based around getting the rich to do something 'good' by making it worth their while to do so. On this front I must commend him for his ingenuity. Still, there's something about his work that gives me the creeps, yet I cannot seem to identify specifically what that something might be! Oooo, it's gonna bug me now!" -Kal'shazzar

Certainly not the first such entity I've encountered, and most definitely not the last - while I'd certainly love to get a tad more hands-on with him, the discussion of dissection tends to be frowned upon in these circles... so for the time being, I'll abstain. As for my personal opinion? He is... restricted. There is little that can be done when one's very existence and modus operandi is tied to a wholly outmoded conceptual basis.
