Why are some genres so known for having such short songs? Noise, punk, and such like that seems to constantly consist of short songs.

I think it's because punk is quite stripped down and simplistic that it wouldn't make much sense creating a long, drawn-out song... also, I don't think noise tracks in general tend to be short, I think noisecore is what you're thinking of.

That makes sense.

And no, I'm generally referring to noise as a whole. Most of the noise I know so far is rather short. Health, which is noise and noise/electronic, has 10 to 11-track albums that are only like...28 to 30 minutes long.

The Soupicans, an noise punk band, has a 22 minute LP and a 9 minute EP.

The shortest songs from Crystal Castles are the most likely ones to be noise.

Devin Townsends noise music seems to be longer, though.

Swans seems to have one 23 minute long noise track, though.

Hella has some noise (Actually, their music is pretty much noise/math rock clash), and the ones that are mostly noise seem to be the shortest.

I don't really know a lot of noise, though.

That won't happen. I have done nothing wrong. Blame Justin Bieber for after years of churning out dreadful songs, he makes one I like. It's his fault.

Most of them are noise rock, the thing is whenever I hear the word "noise", I tend to think of artists like Merzbow who have 10-20 minute long tracks.

Venetian Snares-Huge Chrome Peach

Almost done with my electronic bands...again...and I can't actually think of anything to add for once. I always had Venetian Snares, Aphex Twin, and Crystal Castles as possible ones to add, and now I'm finally almost done with them now that I gave in and added them.
