It's really interesting how many different things can influence the magical powers of a witch- like, I get age and influence, and I guess hair color can make sense to, but cat type and diet affecting power is really unique and interesting! Also, it's really cool how women have a 50% base chance of becoming a witch.

The Isaurian 'Demon-Princess' is more a product of people passing unfair judgement on a traumatized little girl than any semblance of demonic corruption, but the pervasiveness of the people's perception of her evil-ness has actually caused her to gravitate to those she sees as 'evil'.

Honestly, I'd say that would be a useful judgement of character for the people she interacts with. "She likes you? Die please."

It seems that they're in modern-day Anatolia (fancy word for Asian Turkey), and that the current ruler's father was basically fucked over by a false rape accusation (yes I know it's accusation of adultery but false rape accusation is the modern-day equivalent)

AN: So for a federation of tribes, they sure seem to be advanced. To them, economic warfare is completely different to military warfare, which is kind of the way it is handled irl, except for when it's not?

They also are foreign to name-calling (like "The enemy is a fucking monster" kind, I presume?), which as I see it hampers their magical abilities as having a namecalling culture might be able to help them target their enemy better.

Their nation happens to have English/European place names as a result of colonization, and their leader also plays in some sort of band.

They'll call people names, but they will not curse when they do so. For the Caleshan, careful consideration of one's word choice is considered to be a clear indicator of sincerity, so their namecalling is... poetic. If a Caleshan calls you a creep or a loser, they're not being sincere. If they call you a Malignant Husk of Fetid Flesh, their hate for you runs hard and deep.

The nation has a very high amount of biome diversity, ranging from cold tundras and semi-arid deserts to jungles and wetlands. This is quite impressive for a nation about the same size as Iran (in terms of land area), but it's not entirely impossible. So, I gotta give credit where credit is due.

Oops, must have been a math error, my apologies. Still impressive given the nation's size though.

A glamorous section of Wetlanders abroad live the life of the migrating cowboy up into Nebraska, but an interesting side note is how this impacts the agricultural communities along the way, as the crops are ruined by the herds, and the native farmers get upset.

That its the last remaining nation of a culture, and they use magic. Their land is a cirde.

Once upon a time, a man succeeded in making a small nation of 1,000 people think, act, and look the same.
Now that nation has grown, the man who succeeded has died, but its legacy of equality will last forever.

Their leader, Kazimir Grigoriy, developed magical abilities at the age of 8. The event made his guardians a lot stricter in his upbringing, and Kazimir taught himself to control his own emotions in order to better manipulate said magical abilities and avoid any accidents. His magical abilities were fully developed by the age of 11.

AAN: Though technically discovered by explorers in the 1640s, the land of Alaska did not begin a formal colonization processes until nearly a century later under the authority of the Tsar. Initial colonizers consisted mostly of fur-trappers, fishermen, and others seeking to take advantage of the local wildlife. This eventually turned smaller outposts into larger population centers, aided by further colonization efforts along with the discovery of gold in the late 1700s.

AN: Their capital is Capitol City but their largest city is Victory City.
