Their capital city is almost twice the size of their second largest city

AN: their power comes from large petroleum reserves and two major hydroelectric dams

Being an industrialized nation, they've managed to be self-sufficient. However, this makes them an open door to economic collapse and virtually makes their currency undesirable in the outside world, despite their claims of being much more valuable.

Their political model is closer to a Directorial Republic than you run-of-the-mill Presidential or Parliamentarian: It has a Grand Council, which is represented by the Standing Councillor.

"Unlike his brother, Henry was not a political man (and thus, a much more popular Prince than the infamous Crown Prince William) and as such, he was appreciated by his Father and his Country as much for being a capable Naval Officer as he was for being a natural diplomat."

By this information, I kinda learned that Heinrich, North German Emperor, has some similarity with Tsar Nicholas II of Russia and one of our own Emperors. The Tsar and Heinrich were not men of politics but off military. The difference is that Nicholas enlisted in the army whilst Heinrich was a naval officer and a diplomat. However, Heinrich was also not plagued by the socialist revolution and got killed.

Thirty years before the present, the home system of the Empire was split into two factions, one being a corrupt theocratic state that starved its own people into submission.
