I love to play mind games with everybody here when it comes to rick'roll; sure, it's "immature" and a "dead" meme, but I ain't stopping if people are angry at getting rick'rolled and Never Gonna Give You Up is a meme that, until this world literally blows up, will never die.

The art of Rickrolling is a timeless art indeed, those who complain merely expose themselves as not having a proper sense of taste and style yet.

Far-PT would get self-censored bad. I wrote a few rough drafts on the proto-Tohorinese of the LP-universe:

I can get past the cannibalism and raiding EEFs while evading steppe-nomads but shared fatherhood and casual sex are real doozies. Also, hardcore nudity.

That's only the Puebloan-Nahuatl mish-mash called Tohorin.

Weirdly enough, all my plans for PT LP involve some time before or after the Mediterranean Bronze Age collapse if I want to give the illusion of realism. If I go full crazy, I'd go further back...like Green Sahara and alien catgirls being worshipped in pre-Dynastic Egypt or some crap like that. Oh! That reminds me!

Cliché: Alien MacGuffins + Ancient Egypt.

There's nothing wrong with it, of course, but it seems to be quite common. Some nations that are manifestations of it include:

- > Western Fardelshufflestein
- > Gandoor
- > Aikoland
- > Mobius and the Biscay

There certainly is a whole lot more of them out there.

Bonus points if the landmass is big enough that it should have some sort of effect on the sea currents and climate, but doesn't. Even more bonus points if world history stayed exactly the same even though there is an entirely new landmass. Las Palmeras is the only nation I know of that thought about the consequences of plopping down a landmass in the middle of the ocean somewhere, and I would like to see more of it because I think that's more interesting.

There was somebody in F&N who once wanted a massive island the size of half of Europe in the middle of the Atlantic and we all told him it would give Europe permafrost (because you break the Gulf Stream) and he was all indignantly offended about it. <.>

At the end of the day, alternate history that isn't about a specific scenario and which doesn't take place under a short amount of time has a tendency to be a fool's errand. In the long run, the genre is closer to fantasy as it's speculation built upon more speculations for scenarios which start off difficult to guess-stimate and whose consequences would end up branching off even more. This is especially true of settings with Points of Divergence that go further back in time.

I try to make LP look realistic, but it's anything but. My biggest sin is that LP's existence screwing up the Atlantic Slave Trade but modern history running it's usual course, as you've said.
