Don't even know that one yet. I will eventually. The band is pretty interesting. The album I know best is like post-rock, math rock, and electronic music. Then they went even more electronic and the post-rock and guitar work was pushed back even more, but they were still very unique and original.

65daysofstatic-Dance Parties \(Distant\)

Like this is absolutely nothing like the album I know best, and is even a little....dancy.

I first heard it in a trailer for Binary Domain, just like I heard this next one in a trailer for Vanquish:

Video game trailers are a great way to find new music.

Video game companies seem to put more effort (Most of the time) to find interesting music to put onto their trailers. Stuff that isn't just like "Let's grab the latest popular music!" for the sake of popular music

With the exception of that one Medal of Honor ones that had Eminem AND Linkin Park

That's another thing. Even the most boring, straightforward games (In my mind) still seem to put effort into finding relatively decent music. And not just the latest hits.

For Call of Duty: Black Ops 2, there is this and this which I got from it, and I haven't even played it.

Another game I got this.

Fuel got me into Unkle and my entire family except maybe my sister.

Assassins Creed got me into Woodkid, and my mom, though everyone else enjoyed it as well.

What can I say for movies? I have no clue. Not much. At least trailer-wise, because Skins did get me to check out this because I was liking the sounds I heard in the background.

Pandering would be choosing the latest, most popular hits, in my mind, not getting attention to something that most people haven't even heard of.

If Linkin Park is in a trailer, nobody goes "OMG LINKIN PARK WAS IN THE TRAILER <3" because it's not a big deal, everyone expects that. By putting Sigur Ros in a trailer, people start going "whoa sigur ros is in the trailer i knew the game would be boring :)" and it spreads and people want to see it just for how the music is and it gives it a boost.

So you'd rather they just grab the boring ass shit instead? I'm not going to deny they don't do it for extra credit, but I much prefer it over throwing something like Lady Gaga in a trailer for the sake of the latest popular hit. At least sometimes they give attention to something that deserves attention.

i'm not gonna say i would care if it was in a good trailer either really they should use some of their budget to use some original music!
