Refusing to follow orders is considered a form of sedition under our laws. And sedition is punishable by torture and death. And it doesn't matter if it violates "international laws", we didn't sign any such international agreements, we're almost certainly larger than whatever that organization is, and we plan to kill anyone that tries to stop us anyways. The only laws we recognize as legitimate are our own; we have a longstanding policy of violently killing any third parties that try to tell us we're not allowed to do something.

Not necessarily a crime, just as a politician smacking someone in the face with a baton for spraying them with cheese fizz is not necessarily a crime.

Fined for damages due to waste of resources, unnecessary carbon emissions, and risk to public safety and property. Definitely not because of political reasons.

I'll reiterate this for the next nation:

Burning the country's flag.

If deadly in the sense that it smells bad: legal, though it is also legal to kick you out of public transit/shop/restaurant

Literally deadly: mandatory medical procedure to remove the ability to fart poison.

I'll assume the last posted question is the one I shall answer. ☐

For what it's worth, pineapple on pizza is a national cuisine. Given our food quality stat, that should settle the debate here and now over whether it should ever be a crime.
