I'm surprised we don't see as many nations based on Avatar (James Cameron not Airbender), because that's pretty much the concept. In fact for how successful the movie was I'm surprised people basically just forgot about it

Our home planet, Nomia 329H, is surrounded by alien empires that are interested in our species, so we may have to do a guerrilla war to show them who's boss

Could be the opposite - a competent MT force with BVR artillery and missiles could pretty easily smash a lot of the Napoleonic style mass ground formations you see in stuff like Star Wars and the MCU. Experienced NSFT nations tend to be well above most visual sci-fi in doctrinal terms, though.

I think an FT/MT proxy war RP with FT nations covertly aiding MT ones behind the scenes could be cool too. Proxy wars in general are basically nonexistent on II though, let alone something as esoteric as an FT/MT one.

Characters do not necessarily need to have flaws-this is true-but only if they can be written in a compelling way.
Considering your current writing repertoire mainly consists of one liner posts in an RP about northumbria seceding from britain, I'm going to make a big ol reach here and say that you don't fulfill those qualities.

Characters do, for the most part, need a flaw. It doesn't need to be something crippling, or something that drags them down, but an issue they have-they could be overly perfectionist, emotionally numb, just as much as they could be depressed or anxious or even more severe ones like afflicted with terminal cancer, blind/deaf, or just straight up paralyzed.

It's not something you tack on for brownie points, its something you ingrain as part of making a character more than a puppet to move around.

To be fair, do you personally consider a character being ahead of their time as a potentially feasible flaw? Since ofc, thinking differently than how others do can land you in some quite delicate situations that can be explored with good writing

Hm. I suppose that would depend on the setting, but yes, a character with policies a bit too forward thinking for the time could be a flaw, or even part of their story altogether to implement those ideas against a society focused on its current beliefs.

As reasonable as it can be to have people outraged, to me it's just Tuesday. Is it awful? Yeah, that is why there are suggestions being made, an actual constructive stuff, the whole shebang. But that short burst of outrage is just another Tuesday.

My sig is full enough as it is, weighing in at 4400 characters.

Maybe the lack of clichés (thankfully) - I don't think I see a lot of Rastafarian or Jamaica-based cities. Then again, it will stereotypically boil down to weed.

While I think certain people's reactions have been more severe than necessary, increased moderator transparency is in the interest of everyone. An open discussion regarding the policies and processes of moderators has long been requested and never delivered upon.

I don't think anyone outside NSG really cares tbh, almost all moderation reports come from there anyways

Well, it's finally time I suppose there is a discussion about moderator transparency that everyone wants.

Unless, let's say, there are grievances needed to be discussed, I think not everyone outside of General would care that much.

Maybe I'm just cynical as usual in these current circumstances.

Yeah, ahh... Trial and error! Copy-pasting my entire sig into Word shows 4400+ characters, with all the rainbow color codes and all, haha!

Because of the way the Sig works on an old ass dinosaur Forum that we actually still know and love, you just need to trial and error this.

That explains why I can't write something in my sig in multiple colours...oh well.

I'm just gonna divert the moderator transparency topic to something more benign. Continuing from the cliché about PT militaries using experimental weapons in large numbers, I'll go for super-heavy tanks because every single one of us loves super-heavy tanks like the Maus, E-100, P.1000 Ratte, P.1500 Monster.

Another cliché off the top of my head, but I am actually quite surprised and happy that I don't see it a lot on NS. Then again... There are other ways that most leaders show their villainy.

In movies, cartoons, even kid shows from the days of old; wanna know if that is a bad guy? Give him a cigarette. A corrupt businessman? Fat cigar.

I suppose NS' leaders just have less cigars on their minds, and more of smoking towns and cities that have wronged them!

Does the smoke that comes out of the barrels of a firing squad's Mosin-Nagants count? 🤔 If so, then... yeah, there's quite a bit of smoke here...

In all seriousness, though, why did that trope come up in a lot of media in the first place? Was it to show "smoking is bad"? Is it because we get the impression of someone being influential if they smoke? I dunno, man. I'm too small-brained to try and figure out the reasoning behind this.

Eh, I don't think so once you've mentioned that because forts are susceptible to attack by enemies since, ya know, forts have soldiers and military materiel they want to capture and/or destroy.

The smoking thing seems like a carry over from the 80s or 90s where everyone is going "Drugs are bad, mkay?".

Though the stranger thing is that the smoking is bad existed as early as old Walt Disney Cartoons. It was not exactly portrayed as cool (remember those hooligan kids in Pinocchio?). Maybeeee classy at best, but that classy guy with smokes often turns out to be a twist villain. This is all the while we have Fred Flintstone advertising Winston cigarettes. So what gives?!

Ack, another research for another time. 🤔

EDIT: Aye, TVTropes said it best: The critical change was in 1964 when the US Surgeon General released a damning report of the incontrovertible link between smoking and lung cancer, which convinced the public to gradually turn against tobacco. By The '70s, the No Smoking trope had gotten sufficient strength that tobacco advertising on American TV was banned and artists were encouraged to downplay tobacco such as in the TV series, Kojak, when the detective switched to lollipops and made them his trademark.

This isn't a cliché but I've had multiple people guessing this nation is set in the Victorian era or late-19th century (which I guess is also the Victorian era considering how long it was) because of my OOC flag and how ignorant of history are people where they think my OOC flag is how people dressed in the late 19th century?

Also, RE: signature sizes, I'm pretty sure formatting doesn't count towards the sig size limit? I know my sig on Gandoor is like 1600 characters but the visible text is only 509, including the titles of the spoiler tags. 473 if you exclude that.
