Correct, I tried making the English-derived words all be from Anglo-Saxon sources instead of French to keep it a little more Middle English-y (even though by then, French had found its way into English vocabulary).

Basically I'm trying to make Cantelese a reversal of what French did to English, but maybe a little less heavily /skip

I am going to hazard a guess that the language spoken in the factbooks would be English, a variant of English developed in modern times removing all possible non-Germanic influences, which is a fascinating project to read up on. Aside from that, the royal family seems to be essentially the same as that which exists in our universe, so I would hazard a guess that this is the result of a war which occurred with France rather than Germany for World War 1, given the presence of an independent Brittany, a Greater Belgium and Italy, and Germany in its prewar borders. Interesting to think about, really.

EDIT: Reading more, there's also the matter of the Norman line of English

Kings breaking off with William II, but I'm not sure what other historical portents that'd bring had it happened.

The Sternenbahn is considered the nervous system of the empire, though I'd say the analogy would fit better with a circulatory system.

The Servants reject technology in favour of what they refer to as the Will, which is essentially the power to warp reality itself out of pure belief. This power relies heavily upon the user's conviction, and therefore can't be used without absolute, genuine faith. The Will is divided into three subsets, known as Potential, Control, and Intention, each of which is associated with a specific test that adherents of the Will must go through.

Despite them agreeing with the idea of scientific advancement, they're against technology. Yes, as the factbook mentions, that's counterintuitive. Also, to make sure each kid has as many parents as possible, each child is raised communally (Communally, as in raised by a multitude of people instead of the usual 2 parents)

Inkopolia is ruled by a semi-absolute theocratic monarchy centred around the Woomy, the alleged creator-goddess and ancient ruler of the Inking species, with matrilineal succession. The Inking religion presumably involves some degree of reincarnation, as the Empress is believed to have personally known the Woomy in other lives. Matriarchy is a recurring theme throughout their government, not just regarding the Empress' succession but also in their legislature and the Empress' advisory council - the latter is explicitly required to be all-female, while the former is referred to as the House of Dames.
