Since 2210, AIs/robots have been recognized as sentient beings and are thus worthy of citizenship and the rights that they mean. Funny, I didn't know Comrade Posadas was okay with that. John C. Lilly be spinning in his grave though, wonder how the dolphins will react to this.

It appears to be a theocratic Christian state in a post-global-warming Australia. That's actually quite the interesting concept.

So, going off their overview here, their nation name translates to Nation of the People of Ghes, and it's a nomadic society with holy-sky-worship as their faith, which is basically believing that the sky is the home of a mother-deity, rain and clouds are her kids, and weird clouds are viewed as bearers and messengers.

Rhodesia never died in this timeline. Well, Zimbabwe-Rhodesia is a thing, but honestly that's probably the best outcome of the three possibilities. As a result, Britain is so fucked that David Bowie is an insurgent leading a significant revolt, though with the values of the Futurists it's not surprising he'd be taken in with them.

Their religion doesn't seem to have any concrete concept or ideology regarding humanity's purpose, or things such as the afterlife. Most religions have one, at least vaguely. So, that is a distinguishing feature of this religion. Oh, I meant pagan faith.

As could be expected from angry horsemen, Ghes warriors prefer short but very mobile engagements meant at wearing down their foes or breaking down their defenses and are all around comfortable in ranged combat, be it by striking enemies with their composite bows or keeping them at bay with long lances.
