The consolidation of the French Pacific Union at the start of the 19th Century meant cultural genocide for the native inhabitants under the scrutiny of missionaries...which also means that Paul Gauguin probably didn't get to draw weirdly colored paintings of naked-teenage-girls art later on.

AN: Technology in their setting is a bit topsy-turvy, especially domestic appliances and electronics which span different generations. Style and fashion are consistent with a single historical horizon though.

Montse is a doting, caring mother who would probably fight the world for her son. Instead of being like most royalty where the children are relegated to being cared by servants, Montse looked after her Thoma herself.

Remulians are ram-horned humans with chips that record their experiences, allowing them to quickly come back to life. They also can manipulate the strong and weak nuclear force, making them a terrifying foe. They also create pocket universes.

The Geshites have several ideas about the Sky-Mother, the most disturbing being that she is Earth, more or less, and allows life to exist because she loves her children but she could destroy them at any time.

The National Underground Rail System provides transportation to and from the various district capitals. I'm curious as to if smaller cities are allowed to incorporate their own subways into it, though.

During the winter solstice, the Sun Dance ritual is performed. It is a bloodletting ritual meant to offer morsels of blood to the Sun Goddess, so she can regain her strength and vanquish the Winter's nocturnal darkness, thus ensuring the cycle of agricultural regeneration and growth during Spring and Summer.
