not a crime, but i'd think that a more theocratic country would have some sort of public shaming, and then a deportation/imprisonment refusing vaccinations, especially during a pandemic?

Sounds unintentional, so no crime committed unless there are casualties.

If into means into the side of it, causing damage to the building or, say, a window cleaner, then you'd be fined and have it put on your criminal record, but you'd mostly just be laughed at by the firefighter squeegeeing your neon-Lycra-clad gecko self off the wall while you promise it was an accident (it wasn't) or that you won't do it again (you will)

If into means through an open window or the like in order to infiltrate government activities, you'd be given a bajillion drugs and alcohol tests (because who does that without being off their face) and if you were negative on all of them, you'd be jailed for 3 months, and you wouldn't be allowed closer than half a mile from any government buildings/army bases/etc.

{Edit} Completely forgot to do a crime but New Treyland already did one so thanks

If said person who sold the poisoned food knew it was actually poisoned, well, that's attempted murder which is punishable with death.

If the seller didn't know such food was poisoned then he would have to pay the medical cost, or in case of death, he could be up to 5 years in jail.

A rare way this can become a crime is if the child is dead or in severe condition due to this.
Otherwise, no charges.

Most likely would be forced upon the victims, could see a variety of charges including kidnapping, assault, and unwanted lewd/explicit acts, which not only lands you about 35 years or more in prison, but also puts you under 20 years of government supervision for the whole "unwanted lewd/explicit acts" thing, which I mentioned the punishment for any kind of SA earlier.
