Using 12th century languages as a justification for separatism is something I've seen for the first time today 🤔 to be fair this is basically the same justification for separatism in the case of Wales, Scotland etc. they just larp hard enough to have their languages still exist despite being useless

Anglo-Saxon garing changed all that 🤔

Did Northumbrian exist?
Was Northumbria ethnically Celtic?

Cumbric is long dead and Cumbria hasn't been Celtic for centuries now.

How do you reach the conclusion that it will be a second Cornwall? That makes literally no sense.

I feel like a lot of regions of many countries will start to try and find out about their local history again and many people are rather fed up of their current governments, and one place where this is starting to happen is Cumbria. I feel after Scotland's inevitable independence, Cornwall will likely become a devolved nation of what remains of the UK, seeing this, Cumbria would likely become like how Cornwall is now, then they'll have autonomy, then others will likely follow.

The average Cumbrian is English and would have no fucking idea what the hell you're saying, you would probably be laughed at. You sound like you're larping out one of those 'alternate future of Europe' mapping videos without any realistic setting nor idea of what you're on about other than 'this existed historically and HOI4 lets me become wacky pagan in that!'

Neither Cornwall nor Cumbria are going to end up as 'devolved nations', neither of them (aside from very fringe loony groups) probably care. Also I highly doubt Westminster would let Scotland go any time soon so that idea isn't likely either.

You could say the same with Sumeria for example, say hypothetically they have an independence movement from Iraq, they had their own civilization, culture, religion, language and technology, since then the Persians, Babylonians, Muslims and even Europeans have replaced the region with their own culture.
