A big cliché for the NS forums, particularly in the 2020s, would be a sudden increase in ADBOTS! and lots of 'em too. Even though the moderator team taught whoever was operating them a lesson, they never heeded our warnings, and they can get pretty annoying at times.

The moderators have had to teach me many lessons. I forgot most of them.

OK so this just needs to be said:

Adbots, despite having the word 'bot' in the name, are not bot accounts.

This is something that the mods are fairly clear about whenever someone acts like these are actually automated spam accounts.

These are people being paid like basically pennies in places like India or China to spam links all over the web. There's no single person operating these accounts.

exactly, doubtful they even see their nations get banned half the time. They're here to drop some links and move on to the next sites on their list. They literally do not care

It's for the purposes of building a customer base, any 2-bit warlord can provide some of that sweet, sweet black gold, but only we provide a FREE banana basket with it.

One of the biggest cliches here imo are Utopian Marxist-Leninist nations.

"Bots" in this sense are accounts created to do nothing but spam links. Spamming links manually is still using a bot, since that is the only use of the nation.

Utopian Marxist nations are just another subset of "utopia insert my ideology here" as a cliché. And most of those nations tend to be centrist.

That is literally not what bot means.

A bot is specifically a program that performs an action either automatically or on command, so if there's an actual person spamming links, then it's not a bot because last I checked, a human being is not a computer program.

NS Cliche: Space-Nations naming their planetary invasion forces marines

I get it's inspired by Halo (probably?) but it's always been strange to me how common it is, even with all the comparisons to the sea and space.

It's not inspired from Halo lmao.

Space marines have been a thing in science-fiction since the 1930s, what the hell.

If you assume that Space Is An Ocean, then the existence of "amphibious warfare" units makes perfect sense, little to do with Halo.

I'd also put it as Halo copying it from other sources. Heinlein's Starship Troopers anyone?

To be absolutely honest, Halo didn't really do a lot towards inspiring, in a relativistic sense (i.e. compared to some other franchises). Which is not to put it negatively, I love Halo!

If an Average Joe sees a space empire, chances are good that it's 85% inspired by Star Wars, then maybe Star Trek. Star Wars, in my opinion, sort of became synonymous with sci-fi (with a hint of space fantasy).

If you really, REALLY want to go back and you're an old geyser (no offense ♥), I will say H. G. Wells.

I wouldn't say copying.

Starship Troopers is typically considered the defining work for the idea of space marines, but as I already said the concept existed before Starship Troopers was published and, considering how much space marines are a staple in science-fiction works nowadays, I don't think you can even call it copying anymore. It's just what space marines are.

I mean, I don't have robots proper, but I don't recall if I actually wrote up AI being used for agriculture, science, and the space force (tracking debris and objects in orbit, technically half military)... Plus cybersecurity to a limited extent.
