"It is intriguing to think that I can empathize with this priestess on a lot of levels, in spite of the differences in our leanings. There is a lot to her situation that meshes closely with the benefits and costs that come of being a Cala, as the level of power and commensurate responsibility are very keenly felt. I daresay that if we exclude our disagreement on military proclivities (and perhaps the spiritual cohabitation with a deity because thinking about that gives me a headache) that we have a great deal in common, including linguistic preferences and meditation. It would be a pleasure to speak with her on such subjects." -Cala Granses Wavetrasher

Godulan Puppet #2, RPing as technologically advanced tribal society founded by mongols and vikings (and later with multiple other Asian and Native American cultures) motivated by an intrinsic devotion to the spirit of competition. They'll walk softly, talk softly, and make soothing noises as they stab you in the back and take your stuff... unless you're another Caleshan, whereupon they'll only stab you in the back figuratively!

"Mr. Wavetrasher, oh how quaint, what a fitting name for a shipyard builder...your dossier says you're quite the businessman, a profession where battles of wits and the tongue are the deciding factors of victories, sometimes not obvious or even immediate. How fortunate I was not born into a merchant family, I don't believe I could operate a lemonade stand.

But enough about me. I'm ambivalent over the avoidance of violence...if it is unnecessary conflict you wish to avoid, then you're a very capable individual. Miscalculations over how to project force are always a concerning factor for any statesman or public figure, especially when dealing with outsiders. But if you prefer to use the pen depending on ever changing political circumstances, then who am I to judge? I certainly hope there is a blade behind the pen to give it some weight, for your sake, however I'm certain your colleagues have you protected, so good luck Wavetrasher. They certainly must to keep the security of that inter-connected system of trade which you're likely justified in feeling proud of."

Context: Marmesont literally has zero chill to give today, or anyday, really. No one ought to misbehave or make a mistake in front of him, because the divine punishment is coming fast in the form of spontaneous shouting or a slightly less spontaneous dropkick. Do not drop tools, do not throw stuff, do not violate safety regulations, do not be a moron -- these are actually quite hard if you consider the works in the war factories. Inevitably, one of the technicians under him drops a box of test ammunition.

"I usually do not pick on children. I really do not... but she has stepped up to the world and I will respect that wish by judging her as an adult. There... don't blame me if profanity happens."

"Maturity is but a measurement of mentality. It doesn't matter how old you are. But eventually, it boils down to the fact that you are a product of your childhood, and will continue to be as such -- everyone will continue to be as such until they make an effort to break free. But is there a need to break free from the cycle? Sometimes, there simply is not one, as one might be satisfied with the self that has been developed, subconsciously or not. I do not have to look hard to see that you are not satisfied with your past and try your best to seek the freedom and identity deprived from you by your parents. I, too, am a father, of three children in fact, and I know I have been demanding. But there have never been a time I used them to further my own motives or refused to understand their needs. It is unfortunate that you have been through such a time. Honestly, it is even kind of upsetting having to learn about it."

"But now, all that matters is your growth. The wings you will eventually use to fly. That includes the friends who are alongside you. There is no such thing as a lone wolf or a single lark -- everyone needs company, and the cult of personality does not substitute for true companionship. I know I am not the best man to speak about companionship when I just dropkicked my colleague for dropping some ammos. But I do have friends I can trust, and they are better than blind believers, regardless of ideology."

To be perfectly honest most people your highness most people don't take to well to Immortality all to well, some go crazy, some go off the deep end so far that they forget what they are in the first place. It's honestly pretty clear where you fall on the spectrum. Ya proclaim to be some sort of paragon of civilization and order and what not but really all yer doing is building a façade of civilization that died out a long time ago. Your essentially playing dress up what with giving the Romans laser guns though.

Your civilization is built up of clones that can't conceive of questioning your authority. That are built around fulfilling your dreams of Empire to a world that has moved on. I pity you mostly, but with this payment plan that pity can be channeled to much more fruitful use of time!"

"Ye be quite small aren't ya Mr. Vasa? I swear I could probably squish yer head with just fingers son! Heh.

I'll say you would be one of the lucky ones in my world. In this day and age of mine, being born so weak getting offed at the start would be a mercy in some ways, but ya got parents in high places and money to spare and just to be clear I don't fault ya for that or anything, although I'll admit to being just a bit jealous.

Though I daresay you are quite young to be waging such a big war eh? 15 and already telling esoteric forces of nature to go straight fuck themselves? HA!

Though I have to say that I find the dichotomy of being for Free Will while also being for Expansionism quite conflicting. The act of expansionism is usually compounded with the act of taking away a peoples right to self govern aint it? Isn't that the exact opposite of accommodating free will?

Heh, not my place to question I guess. Now usually this is where I lead off with a sales pitch but my bosses say I'm not allowed on account of the whole war against Heaven and the Afterlife and all that. Which is to bad honestly, really wanted to see if I could punch an angel. Another time maybe!"

"I don't have to read much of the profile to know that the policies S'vehn are careless at best. Asymmetrical warfare is one of the most vile, disgusting things I have ever had the chance of combating. Plainclothes fighters, indirect warfare... and for what, a pile of dead children and some extra land? Ehk... no matter. It fails eventually, that's what I learned in the White Mountains...

As for policy, I have a few more qualms. Expansionism, first off, puts the people of Rtsin at risk. I have no soft spot for the ideals of expanding an empire beyond its borders. If it didn't work for Rronk and the Kömansbemfamily, why would it work otherwise? Not to mention if the primitives somehow see our system as exploitable, we will have to breach our peace that the IUR has worked so hard to maintain. Second is the hatred of deities. While I'm not deeply religious myself, I still believe that the only reason why the hatred runs deep is simply because Rtsin values us over all else. Or, ahem, maybe Rtsin does not exist across the other dimensions. However, on a brighter note, I will say that relegating an AI to do administrative duties is something not expected from the primitives, but it is odd that emotional factors can seemingly be cut out.

My final conclusion? Ehmm... definitely a high level threat. If we had the fleet to respond, we almost certainly would."

absolutely self centered, so absolutely moronic, as to believe that they could face off against the very forces of the universe. The spawn of Emperors are always spoiled, always ensured slots in the most prestigious educational facilities no matter their aptitude, always offered the greatest opportunities despite the many others who would fill the role better. We suppose at the very least FenexOrg was lucky enough that their Monarch at least held on to a semblance of the knowledge that education brings.

We give some condolences to their genetic plight, as such a thing clearly weighed heavy on their early life, enough for them to see, once they escaped the walls of their gold lined echo chamber, that the people around them suffered and died under the oppression of lone rule. But the next step of their life is truly what baffles us. Rather than say, work with the citizens to help improve their quality of life, or work to convince his parents of their wrongdoing, this child stole a super weapon and escaped to fight a god.

Our people have primarily chosen to disregard the concept of a true and high creator of all. We regard spirituality as a true and real facet of life, of course, but one being creating the universe is unlikely, and we choose to continue as such. Though us on The Council know that not one of us would fight him if we knew his existence. To fight a creator like that is futile, as futile as fighting the passing of time, or fighting the light passing by you. In the end, The Council disregards this Sven, a child too busy dreaming up schoolyard dreams of becoming a deity to actually assist his people, and a Monarch over aggressors and raiders almost exclusively."

We hope there are little hard feelings though, after all, we merely did it for the good of the younglings who did not deserve to live life in sweatshops and military production facilities.

Ah, but, no need for pleasantries, we must give our opinion on you after all. We have never been immensely approving of Military Juntas; they were some of the first Empires we tore apart on our own planet. Your nation is simply a junta at it's largest extent, and you are the head that leads the abomination. The barrel of a gun is your political debate, and the marching of soldiers is your national hymn. You personally seem to follow this ideal even in your own personality.

Quiet, collected, but able to rant like few others. Xenophobic, attacking, suppressive, hoarding power for yourself. You do your job well, even if that job is horrific and oppressive. We'd imagine if your fleet was built up enough, we might have needed to worry about war with your people, but as you seem somewhat occupied with your own planet, we have the luxury of being able to disregard you. But nonetheless, we wish you luck in your future, if only so that once you reach the stars, your people may find their way into your politics on their own."

Replacing individual strength with the bickering of committee. Most tellingly, the Council is seemingly united in its belief and voice. Lofty equality and not equity, and freedom of useless speech but not freedom of revolutionary action no matter how harmful. The uniformity in the council's opinion suggests that they act more like a hivemind rather than a council brewing with different opinion and thought where factionalism thrive. Without factionalism, the status quo would be blindly upheld and thus the political rot will kick in as politics stagnate without any new ideas. Councilism will spell the end of the UCBR. A populist will arise to blame all of their woes onto a faceless committee of bureaucrats with unlimited terms which represents the very soul of its politics. That populist would be an Übermensch in his own right by putting an end to this childish play."

"When I see his past and present, I feel pity for he has much good intentions led astray. To defeat authoritarianism in its various forms is of course an admirable goal, but in the course of attempting to achieve them he has made many errors. In particular his interpretation of achieving anarchism is incorrect, for one cannot replace the place in which a government stood with nothing, for the state apparatus must remain present for some time to follow in transition to anarchy. What is more, with his leadership he has decided to expand his influence further and further to various nations, and I fear he shall attempt to overstep his boundaries and attack those nations which have every right to self-determination."

"I... um... I suppose that... that the whole "interventionist" business is a profitable one, but... wow, that is a raging hatred for communism there. Do you really take that much offense in the color red, dear? Or are you just a hemophiliac like dear old Alexei was? I mean, to a certain extent I can understand disliking the seizure of your property- anyone tries to take the Anzio from me and I'm liable to commit a war crime- but this? Dear, this is just silly. And I'm not even going to comment on your, er, love life- I mean, I've no real stake in things romantic, but... you'd think that someone who supposedly cares about their people wouldn't go around shagging a genocidal piece of shit like that. You'd also expect said person to not go around denying other states the right to exist. Or calling things "colonial"- god, that words ruined. It's not a good look for you. And definitely not the sort of look I'd associate my organization with."

"Bit of a dreamer at the beginning were ya? Yeah, working for the military is never as glamorous as they make it out, that just speaks to the value of having an effective PR system. Unless your politically minded most people never really notice that CFC has it's fingers in so many military and political pies because CFC PR focuses it's propaganda (and it is propaganda even though I'm told to call it "aggressive advertising" but who are we kidding

Which is why I applaud the image you have built around yourself and your company. Image is everything, and what you can get away with can sometimes bridge entirely on what your image means to others. In a Mercenaries case it's best to be known as a neutral entity till paid to be otherwise, but to also have some discretion about what contracts they take, it don't matter a bit how much you offered if your on the wrong side of history after all and countries have long memories and can hold even longer grudges.
