Something that doesn't really bother me, but just something I've noticed, is that some PMT nations are just thinly veiled FT nations. PMT just seems like a super niche tech level to actually get right.

Not that he's wrong tho. There are quite a few monarchies where the leader is either a SocDem superhero who - despite being a 'constitutional figurehead' monarch - holds significant sway over the government and does all the good things like stop global warming or legalize gay. Or a SocDem superhero who does all those things while carrying around their massive god-given - uh - inheritance. And usually, the latter is a woman (though as Kuranos has pointed out, there are exceptions).

These kind of nations don't seem particularly realistic at all. I feel like a monarch who still holds major political powers would have more socially conservative views. These nations would work better if they used a Bernie Sanders/AOC/Justin Trudeau knockoff in a democratic system. But they're insanely popular that they never get voted out. Is this a trope as well, insanely popular socdem leader who never gets voted out even though the elections are completely free and fair?

Well...in my opinion, a Good character is a character that actually feels compelling, one that's had lot of effort put into showing the nooks and crannies of the character, and one that feels...relatable or at least sympathetic, either that or a character that you can enjoy reading and writing about, and one who's fleshed out by a lot, and I do mean a lot, so yeah. My opinion is to be taken with a grain of salt though so don't apply this everywhere.

well, personally what's being critiqued here is what i tend to refer as writers ignoring the principle of "don't ask, don't tell" in terms of a character's, uh, interpersonal relations, unless it matters to the story. this isn't to say you can't write it, it's just more that if you as the writer find yourself going "huh x character is gonna get a hot-ass wife because it gets me going" then you should probab sit back and take a breath. not that i think you do that, this is the general "you" rather than the specific. but i have a hard time defining this, really, so i refer you to justice stewart's comments on the matter. in broader "making characters good" terms, i think you have it down, actually; the point is for me at least not to make a "good character" or an "evil character" but to make a character. i called it character-centered morality a while back, the idea is just to make someone whose morality is their own. like, they can be a horrid person, but as long as they think they're doing the right thing then it sort of makes sense, you know? like, take washington. i know that she's pretty defined by your own experiences but she's good as a character in the sense that she does what she does in a very human sense; she fucks up and she makes mistakes and at times she does things perfectly correctly. but it's all her doing it, you know? it makes sense as something that she might do, and that her decision-making process would reasonably think of. or take evexhas/narcissus from khoro. he's a batshit insane motherfucker who gets prophetic visions from munching down on brains, and his society is literally formed around that principle, but he's still consistent within that worldview because he's doing things to further his own goals and because they make sense to him, not because he's evil.

i really don't know how to describe it further than that, i've stumbled my way through character writing to get where i am and i really need to codify it better.

this. if the character's decisions make sense to the character then that character is consistent. those actions might be batshit insane to us but it's not about us, it's about the characters and their perception of the world around them.
