Another cliché: leaders who served in the military, with their factbooks containing detailed battle actions they participated in. I guess I've seen things like that in actual Wikipedia pages, so that's fine. Though, it's sometimes also an exposition on how OP and talented the leader is.

I know the cliché of people doing European countries near exclusively has been mentioned before but it continues to irritate me. It gets lonely being a middle eastern/central Asian nation and almost makes me want to abandon this nation for a Turkey wank or something just to be closer to the generic euro nations while doing something in my area of interest.

Republic of Dayganistan

A secular, Tajik dominated state in Central Asia which has experienced 40 years of democratic backsliding. NS stats are NOT used.

Really? I've seen far too many Middle Eastern Sultanates and countless Japans

African nations are very underrepresented I'd say, which is surprising because there's just so much alt-hist potential

I don't know. There's the recent influx of Korean and Japanese alt-his nations, and let us not speak of the Filipino (or, to a larger extent, Maritime East Asian) presence in the community at large. African nations are pretty rare, I'll give you that, but there's about as many serious Asian projects here as there are European.

I mean, there's at least a few Iranian nations I can think of, and you're right next to any Chinese or Indian nations- even Soviet Unions can touch you-, so seems to me you're in a pretty good position, especially compared to any PT nations! 🤔

As a concept I find it really interesting but unfortunately I'm not confident enough in my knowledge of history to write anything outside of East Asia or Cold War USSR and Anglo-European sphere.

Another cliché: Vast empires covering most of or all of Earth. They also usually have fairly flimsy history explaining how that was achieved.

Oh and one more: People who make index threads and then don't update them. What's the point?

If anyone reading this is wondering why I haven't done mine, I went away to see family and then my car broke down like 400km from home and I got stuck and I have only just got back, sorry

In some senses, those already exist in real life. Tribal nations scatter the American continent, like the Red Lake Band of Chippewa or the Haudenosaunee nations. Meanwhile, multiple non-tribal nations embrace indigeneity, whether through indigenismo or some other strain of thought. Communities that identify as Incan descendants still persist in South America.

I get what you mean—some kind of full-scale, continent-spanning, millions-and-millions strong nation or empire, outfitted with a modern military, robust taxpayer bases, etc. I only mean to raise some cautiousness on how one hypothetically handles such a nation, because it's not just a matter of alternative history; it's also a matter of an alternative present that many often forget does exist for indigenous peoples. One of the great struggles among North American indigenous nations is the challenge of being recognized as extant nations with as much right to govern as any other.

I feel as if that isn't the case simply because Native American nations are really rare on NS in general. But your concept is even rarer.

The closest thing that I can think of that is what your describing is one of my nations, but they don't count, because it was for an RP and not meant to be taken as a super-serious worldbuilding exercise (Plus, technically speaking, they're only Victorian-Era levels of Technology).

I'm obviously a bit biased here because neutrality is for wusses, but I honestly prefer original nations with original cultures to those based off of real-life civilisations. It's more interesting to read about a country's lore built from scratch than one that's merely a modified version of a country or civilisation I'm already - at least tangentially - acquainted with.

I've found that my enjoyment of the Kiu has only gone up as I've divorced it from its original stylistic influences, even if that was the plan from the beginning and I'm only just slow at writing.

I divide them into 3 groups, each with their own sub-groups

1: The realistic nations

The strive-for-realism nations, they try their best to come up with realistic nations, backstories and locations. Some could actually exist in the real world.

The political-experiment nations

These nations began as a concept, and developed from there.

The political-statement nations

Used to make a statement on real world politics.

2: the alternate history nations

Very common since some people think realistic is boring. They can range from ancient empires to futuristic civilizations. Can also include contemporary versions of former real-world nations.

3: everything else

Often have anime as the flag. Also have weird names. Basically the opposite of the realistic nations.

I'd agree and say what you said is fair, considering how limited our definitions of "nation" are compared to what might possibly be considered as a "nation", but on the other hand I think it's really difficult for many of us to envision a stateless nation as opposed to the sort every recognised nation on Earth is. So when we hear the word "nation", we automatically pivot towards thinking of a bureaucratic structure, hierarchies, territory of some sort as opposed to a conglomeration of people with a common past. After all, we've grown up in this sort of society (unless one of you is from Zapatista territory or something, in which case mantener la lucha contra la injusticia, mis camaradas), and we know nothing but society organised around states, borders, and governments.

Not a fan of low-effort posters either.

However, there's a bit of an epidemic of very low-effort threads on F7. "Conquer, ally or destroy the AN?" or "Which AN has the better flag?" and so on are basically just one-word reply threads (even with me most of the time), and people rarely actually justify their decision.

But making low effort posts in those threads is perfectly fine, I feel: they're designed for quick responses and minimal effort interaction. The problem is when people put low effort responses in threads where having effort posts is an unspoken rule, i.e. "YL's opinion on AL", "Answer AL's question", etc.

The issue is that these people don't care if you respond to them with low quality shit. They really don't. Because at the end of the day they can just churn out fifty more of their low quality summerposts, or they just don't care. They're here to either get satisfaction out of spamming enough of their dollar-store lore without regards for people who've put effort, heart and soul into their creations. Nothing makes me more annoyed than instances recently; I've seen summerposters absolutely stiff blessed effortposters like ASDF (Wexas), Kiu, Bloodshade and more who put LOTS of work into what they do.

At the end of the day the only way to win against these people is to foelist them where you see them. If we all start ignoring them, we might just end up with a decent forum.

Building on top of this, I genuinely don't and would be stupid to expect anyone to write the length of posts that I and some others might write every now and then, neither do I expect the level of effort to match the insanely long post that some might spot across the forums.

One can easily be concise and show some understanding of what they've read. Just a thoughtful sentence or two but eh, I'm only lingering on this site because I want to reply substantially to people who deserve some thought on their lore. It doesn't really take that long for me to write a few paragraphs of my thoughts and opinion so I don't see why I shouldn't. That and I'm awful at being concise anyways. I've long since stopped caring about the replies I get, unless there's thought behind the replies but that is rather rare.
