gorbachev tried to reform the ussr and it was working up until the august coup

it's fair to say that gorbachev's economic reforms were actually fairly dysfunctional and failed to provide any meaningful reform to people's lives. his political reforms high-intractably steered in the direction of the union's dissolution, as well -- the moment the yeltsinite clique attained their position, it's fair to say the USSR was doomed; they were fairly dedicated towards advancing their own interests, which largely involved the dissolution of the USSR; despite a referendum result to the contrary, yeltsin still nevertheless made an agreement with ukraine and belarus to dissolve it.

the august coup was just a useful means to accelerate this faster. it was always going to happen, gorbachev just let it happen less violently.

thats a very fair take tbh but i don't agree. i will agree that yeltsin's clique is undoubtedly one of the roots of the ussr's collapse but the august coup really killed off the idea of any sort of functioning successor state to an already dysfunctional system given that it completely killed off the possibility of the new union treaty ever being signed i think it's fair to say that yeltsin never had the intention of signing a new union treaty.

this is why, when it comes to collapsing the USSR, the blame largely falls in the order of the yeltsin clique, then the gorbachev clique, and then the apparatchiks who kept brezhnev in power for far longer than he needed to be.

And why does it jump from Byzantium to Russia? The Ottoman Empire was but the longest-ruling Roman dynasty. With its end, Turkey as the Ottoman Empire's successor state became a new Roman Republic.

blood and culture. ivan the great (ivan iii) married sophia palaiologina, the niece of the last byzantine emperor (who was the grandmother of ivan the terrible, the first russian tsar) and russia served as the defender of orthodox christianity until the rise of the USSR. the USSR was the successor state to the russian empire, and since kazakhstan was the last state in the USSR, it's the successor state of the USSR, hence giving it the title of roman empire

Marrying a princess means nothing, and religion is irrelevant. Or would some remote, mountainous part of Italy that clung on to whatever form of Roman paganism existed there be the true successor to the Roman Empire? The fact is, Turkey is the Third Rome.
