Sorry, I like making typical shounen, isekai and ecchi protagonists go through hell to subvert animu.

To the point I wrote a rough draft over what happens when a band of teens with swords square off against a 30-something year old gunslinger.

And I based Nova and co's crash on hearsay I read over teenage heavy Panzer crews having mental breakdowns, surrendering or panicking and fleeing after getting repeatedly struck with shells, even if their armor was never in any real danger.

I guess one could say that "teenager" is a new concept and that worker's have always historically been workers. But almost most modern/contemporary accounts of teenagers leading or fighting hint at sub-par performance.

Not far enough. Have a literal child kill God and thus birth the leader of your nation.

I imagine Renge doing 9/11 and god was caught in the crossfire.

Also, unrelated question. I thought it was okay to insult non users of NS? That way dos players could be ridiculed without repercussion. Then again mod rulings don't make any sense anyway.

Always, of course, that the guys in question do it regardless of the condition of your factbooks.

Hmm, maybe I ought to start a Q&A thread... I have a lot of headcanon that I can only develop more in my factbooks when I finish other more critical stuff. I've always sort of thought of my factbooks as a living document, that I can add stuff to whenever. I don't think my factbooks will ever be "complete" as such, even if I get to a point where I'm pretty much satisfied with the contents of a given page.

Sounds like there are a lot of Northumbrian independence supporters on NS then.

If Northumbria is to be "independent" (from what, exactly?), then I think Sophia Kensington's estate should be its own nation as well.

The first step is always the most difficult, but as that proverb would say: The journey of a thousand factbooks and nations, begins with a single word. Or "403 km".

I came with a flag that looks pretty damn terrible in all honesty (Luxembourg flag with actual rainbow sprinkles on it because I went nuts on Powerpoint), no factbooks, didn't even know what those are, and the like. I suppose it pays to look around the nations, click on the icons (which is how I know there are factbooks, aside from the obvious sidebar), and then read it up.

Mind you, Val Z's idea didn't come out of thin air. I have several reiterations of it, including the definitely-cliche-levels of dictatorship, which I wrote it as canonical - it's mentioned like the nation as a whole just had an edgy teenage phase.

The best kind of nations are the ones that, when you started, you had absolutely no idea what you wanted to do with it. When I first started, I unironically used NS-stats to determine how good my nation is. But the longer I am on this site, the less I care about NS-stats. I even stopped looking at the nation classification.

Or maybe it's the fact that wanting independence for something that hasn't even been its own state for over 1000 years is really goddamn fucking weird. Like there's a Northern Independence Party founded last October. It has 1300 registered members. As of the 2011 census, Northern England has 14,933,000 people living there. That is 0.008% of the 2011 population who are members of the party that want that region to become its own nation.

Even you have to admit that it's a complete fringe movement and no shit people are going to be weirded out that there are a few people obsessed with this super specific idea that barely anyone actually supports.

Eh. Northumbria has as much of a right to independence and/or autonomy as Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland, and given Wales has devolution at the very least, it's just ridiculous they don't already have their own "country" within the UK.

It's hardly ridiculous. Northumbria generally has other concerns than devolution -- at the very least, Wales has its own language.

Cumbria has it's own language and it's Celtic, so I could see Cumbria becoming somewhat like a new Cornwall in the coming decades. But, while Northumbria has been separate from England in the past, I don't feel like it has enough to substantiate a valid, popular enough case for even autonomy, let alone independence. Cornwall and Cumbria have a more valid reason, by literally having their own separate ethnicities from England.

Cumbric is long dead and Cumbria hasn't been Celtic for centuries now.

How do you reach the conclusion that it will be a second Cornwall? That makes literally no sense.
