You wanted unconventional "nations"? Well...

FenexOrg (anti-celestial terrorists), Horde of One (literal hivemind IIRC), Valkyrie and Reaper Squadrons (a squadron within a bigger military force fighting a rouge squadron), The Valkyrie Corporation (not to be confused with the squadron. do I need to explain this one?), WonderMart (it's a literal supermarket), UNSPDC (military unit within a larger international organization), CBG-Palisade and Miranda-22 (more like an entire universe of non-nations, from independent space stations to literal mercenary groups), SS-AAA (it's a colony), Wuchu (it's an internet forum, in short), Liagolas (hive dominion), this very account (do I really need to explain this one?)...

Congratulations, you have earned yourself an observer.

As for myself, my attempt at a megacorp was Siliwangi Corporation, which sadly died because I forgot the password to it. While it looks like an evil antitheist faction, it does have some good values, such as traditionalism, loyalty, solidarity, and cooperation. While it very much cares for the bottom line, it's more like a noble demon who'd always fulfill their end of the bargain than a dirty coward who'd run and hide the moment their payment is due. As for their argument for evil? It takes all the atrocities, pain, and suffering in the modern world and how God seemingly does nothing about them, which ties to why they're researching ways to obtain immortality. "You can't go to Hell if you can't die", basically.

mean shit I think my first session of Crusader Kings II ended up lasting all damn night) but I always end up going back to Civilization IV (I know Civ is a totally different genre and all but you know).

I'm more of an AoE 2 guy, and while I have Civ 5 and 6, I have not gotten too deep into it yet, and I missed out on Civ 4. One thing is for certain, I am happy that the games have given me inspiration.

I can tell ya more about it in the Gaming thread, of the shenanigans and antics I have, but truth be told, I am just a few steps after recovery from personal grief.

Who dares to interrupt my hiatus? Who dares to utter the name of the Messengers of the Cosmos?

In all honesty though, this concept was spawned in a hive mind stellaris run, and then just spiralled out of control from vaguely eldritch insectoid hive mind to pseudo-religious plasmoid Hyperconsciousness (a fancy word for hive mind, eh?). As for megacorporations, I think the best example I'm this site is Comerciante, though there are a fair bit of them lurking around.

I actually think Civ IV is one of the reasons why I'm so into world-building with my nations on this game. Think I got my copy of Civ IV when I was 13 and I always liked to imagine actual stories and histories for the world that occurred in my games. Empires rising and falling, wars, revolutions, etc. I never went crazy far with it, but I'd even sometimes 'edit' world maps (read: use Paint.NET) to show the territories in my games and brief descriptions of the different nations that exist and their relationships with each other.

And uh while I did create Gandoor in 2008 when I was 12, I didn't actually join the forums or begin developing it until I was 14, so that was all after I got into Civ.

Shit even to this day I like to come up with stories for my Civ IV games. Sometimes they're silly ones like in one of my games (using the Dawn of Civ mod), New Orleans kept getting traded between French (who I was playing as) and American control during every World Congress, so I'd just imagine that every 15-20 years (or however long the gap between the World Congresses is) everyone in New Orleans would just groan, roll their eyes, and go 'Alright, which flag do we need this time?'

Ah, I think you've just unintentionally brought up a cliché that I don't think was brought up before: concepts spiralling (horribly, in some cases) out of control. Not that it's bad, obviously. Hell, I think I speak for quite a bit of people when I say that we've been "victims" to this one way or another. For example... I don't joke when I say that FPR was meant to be "here's this faction, but I took away the tech that was too bullshit for Red Alert standards, even more so for a paramilitary organization". In case you want to how the idea even spawned... imagine a guy in NW Spain being frustrated after having his (Soviet, in case you wanted to know) base in Mental Omega be bombed to hell by the Mary Sue faction for the 42nd (exaggeration) time in the same match. If you look at it now... what the fuck could it even be described as? Shit, I need to get back to work on this, from the military factbook (fun fact: the 15mil rifle I'm talking about in the sig is a real thing, and, yes, it's gonna be canon) to... the rest of the world. i feel the need to point out firstly that you're describing states rather than nations in the classical sense of the term, and that a horde is arguably a means of organizing a state, but whatever, i digress.

i'd also say that one shouldn't be constrained by those tropes either- who says what you write has to be on the scale of a state? make a bloody independent lecture hall if you want to, or a space station (yes i own this one, idc, i'm bringing it up), or even an alien sea colony with less in the way of technology than biological diatribe. if you're on ns to write, you shouldn't let yourself be tied down by things like the website's title.

Though sometimes I think up mini-worldbuilding scenarios for my games but they never last.

I do have experimented with EU4 worldbuilding for history for Feyrisshire, considering that that's not how the story is supposed to be - <https://www.nationstates.net/nation=fey...id=1482729>. And also the most decent use that I've found is using Civ IV C2C mod and EU4 to determine the placement of natural resources randomly, since geography and natural resources are very difficult to think up for yourself.

Anybody here have leaders who are only described as smart, witty, full of humour, great personality, strong, understanding, genius, logical, calculating and other predominantly positive personality traits with just a few or no flaws?

Most of the time I notice fictional characters are always written like this wherever I go.

The Messianic Kingdom exists after Armageddon, where God installs Jesus as King over Earth in paradisaal conditions and people who are genuine worshippers are perfectly healthy and in their youth forever. No division, no politics, everyone is happy and vibing finally.

This is proof that people can powerwank without the use of future tech armies.

I always give my aces a few broken points, and give them reasonable flaws in their personalities and capabilities. I know that flaws are what make characters balanced, and we are here creating sentient minds with limitations. But I think recently we give ourselves too many rules while writing. (Talking big for someone who wrote character-building guide, I know.) Really, I lowkey believe we are free to make our leaders as good and as bad as we want them to be. The real challenge, though, is making them convincing and conveying your plots and points. Since most NS scenarios seem to be "a country working fine", I feel like they would be in need of a leader who is quite good at their job, yes.

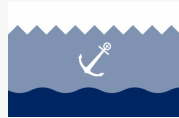

But to answer your question, I think that characters I have seen recently are becoming more balanced and plausible than what I have seen. Yeah, Mary Sueing happens. But I think we are more conscious than before. 🤔

For Yan Sooyoung, I'm trying to flesh out her character to go beyond the simple trope of "Haha basic goddess saves people from evil vices". As far as revisions go, she has evolved to the current premise of being a former military officer, promoted to the position of generalissimo through merit though Yan never truly calloused her heart toward the loss of (friendly) lives. When she was finally given a run for her money by an equally experienced and talented enemy admiral, an arduous battle ensued to the point that Yan had to stray away from her morals to achieve victory. Disillusioned by the discrepancy between her own previously rigorous morals and the actions she committed, the regretful Yan resigned after the ICFE - Rhean War and voluntarily exiled herself for a thousand years in order to well, reflect upon her life choices. She no longer felt worthy of living after treating individual lives as disposable means to an end.

Coming across Erudia, she did sympathize with the fact that the people of the planet were suffering the direct aftermath caused by military authorities; who had plunged the world into a global nuclear war and that's where she currently resides. Wanting to rediscover self-value, she leverages the egalitarian values and wisdom of her home race, but being an alien who refuses to assert dictatorial authority often means her opinions are contested by more petty and trivial concerns inherent to humanity. It is in these disagreements and whatnot are what constantly pre-occupies her mind, ceaselessly labouring to iron out the flaws of humanity and finally complete the Cultural Revolution, rather than just hand-waving it as everyone throwing away their autonomy and obeying her unquestionably. While religion does promote such, in day-to-day life people don't necessarily abide by the Gospel 100% but as those are done behind closed doors; the illusion of a hegemonic society is formed.
