Why thank you GSC, not a lot of people do parody nations like TAFTSE as TAFTSE's only purpose is to be a highly exaggerated parody of all FT nations in all their powerwankiness.

Annie is a very, very common name in the scenarios.

One of the biggest cliches I have noticed in all of my years on this forum, specifically F7, is nations who are just too scared of losing and getting their ass kicked, so they bump up their military's stats to the point where it's just fucking bullshit simply to flaunt how large their cock is on the military threads. I think I would be able to name a few of them. Still, I understand, I had it for a while too until I learned to not give a fuck about powerwankers and just focus on my own ~~unfinished~~ lore and what fits within it.

That's hot.

Anyways, anyone remember the days when self inserts or just personifications were popular? I remember.

I never liked people using self-insert characters on NS.

It always seemed like unintentional bait to verbally abuse the OOC user under the guise of IC opinion. Like, "Haha, he's an fag n-word who should kill himself... bro, what do u mean your feelings are hurt? It's just ic opinion."

I'm telling this myself all the time, pal. Personally I have no problems with self inserts as long as they don't start turning into Mary Sue's.
Also you should change the Russian in your sig into -«Ой-Вей, Шалом!».

Are they still not? It's pretty easy to tell the self insert leaders, usually it's a copy paste of the player's political ideologies that are unanimously well-loved by everyone in the country, the leader itself is basically the player with little differences (little older, possibly gender-swapped, etc.)

And they're days best left in the past, considering your recent posts in the leader thread.

Self-Inserts don't count as characters, they are just an extension of you forced into a literary setting.

Fun fact, the youngest president ever "elected" was 20 years old.

His name was Jean-Claude Duvalier, otherwise known as "Baby Doc" - the son of the Voodoo-Practicing Haitian President Papa Doc and only really became president because his father was president.

He was overthrown by his own people after thousands of Haitians died and Haiti became the most impoverished country in the Western Hemisphere whilst he lived a lavish lifestyle (including a 2-million dollar marriage at the expense of the state).

My posts are fantastic. Plus, my self-insert plays a unique role for my nation. Particularly regarding its religion.

On the topic of personifications and self-inserts, it is of obvious note that personifications are pretty much fine and even some RL countries have them (Uncle Sam, anyone)? Whether or not these are decent or not is up to interpretation, to be honest. For me, I don't have problems with them and actually have a few personifications myself (Val Z has THREE), but you need to get it right, of course.

Self-insert-wise, there are two ends of the spectrum - The blatantly obvious, and the subtle hints. I am not calling out anyone here, it is just a general observation. The obvious ones are when you as an author is put inside it, while the subtle hints are the ones where you can see small parts of an author's personality rubbing off onto the characters. In short, the character is a separate entity, but you can see small hints of author's politics or views in them. That is not a bad thing inherently, it's just a matter of execution. I mean, we are here to RP as nations, it's not exactly the best of Creative Writing 101; personally, all it matters for me is if the character (even the self-inserts) are redeemable or have traits that are not all-positive or all-negative.

My self-insert would be a small and yet powerful man in Valentine Z, who is extremely clumsy and prone to tempers. I am not perfect, not in the slightest! I am a bit of an egomaniac, I will admit that, but even I am not going to admit that my stuff are flawless.

they really ain't tbh. There's not even any flair to it, it's just straight up you. Even other self-inserts tend to be more integrated with their setting. It's a literal OOC factbook and thus shouldn't count as a character at all. Because, again, it's just you. There's no clever fourth wall breaking, there's no real fluff, there's no lore, it's, as I said prior, a genuine OOC factbook that you put a nearly-transparent layer of IC flair on top of.

Same man. There's probably only a handful of nations I could realistically defeat, but working on your own lore is a better feeling than power-wanking. I'd rather have a decent lore than have a nation solely dedicated to power-wanking

To you, they aren't. Nor are they to anyone else for that matter. To me, they are fantastic, a stepping stone to expand upon on my lore. Focusing on the Gods that the Alkdorian worship, and the head of those Gods being Brapture. Whom is every individual on the Patheon. Sure, the factbook may not have that information yet. It is obviously a work in progress. I do plan on adding more to it. In my own time and my own way. It may not be clever or perfect in your eyes but....Since when was I guy who gives a shit about other's opinions. Unless I'm intentionally paying attention to them. Despite saying that I have been paying more attention to those opinions and have become more accepting of them. It's more if people will provide their thoughts when I ask ways to improve my lore.

Lastly, I wouldn't call exactly call it a serf insert. I'm still debating if it will be one, but so far that debate is leaning more towards making Brapture a fictional character and not just name associated with my shenanigans on Discord. When looking at the opportunities between the two options.

A slave/serf insert is a new one, truth be told. Would work as a concept or an account of a slave in a nation!

1. Well obviously, it's a self-proclaimed omnipotent being, not some peasant working a noble's lands 😜
2. the backstory is literally an account of discovering Nationstates, and you routinely trample the fourth wall. Even if you intend on rectifying the self-insert angle in the future, it's a pretty poorly designed character all things considered.

Actually my WIP is partially a self insert of my views circa 2019 and essentially a slave (because she, although being a human being attached to a life support machine is listed as equipment, has technicians servicing her and even comes with a manual). I guess that's a slave-insert?

In Russian RPG's self inserts are EVERYWHERE. I'd even say that they're sometimes viewed as a norm, not a deviation.

Well, it's not like I said it was work in progress or anything. Of course, it is poorly designed. It's a draft before I get to finalizing it. If you have suggestions to aide with writing a cosmic being I'm all ears.

Like seriously, I am. I've been wanting to write such a character but I just don't know how and it's frustrating. As my lore demands it.

Alright, let's take it from the top.
Judging from what you've said prior, this god is the head of a pantheon and a mighty powerful one at that, having created everything in their universe. First off, cut the omniverse and multiverse gibberish. That stuff in general can feel wayyyy out of scale for something focused on a single nation or even a single setting unless it is a core part of it i.e. a time loop or reflection of reality or includes things like Doom's Hell and Urdak, Stranger Things' Upside Down, Minecraft's Nether and End, etc etc

Second of all, consider the dynamic of the pantheon itself. do the gods constantly struggle for supremacy, vying for worship and power among the mortals, or is it a peaceful affair presided over by the eldest of them? If the former, perhaps "Brapture" is powerful only because he is at the highest peak of the pantheon, but could be toppled any day by one of the lesser Gods. If the latter, is he a father figure, a sibling, or something more?

If he is a supposedly omnipotent being, let's tone that down-if part of a pantheon, perhaps he was omnipotent in ages past, but as the religion of his creations diversified and grew more complex and multifaceted, his form, bound by concepts of divinity and the perception of him by his followers, fractured and became separate beings.

This is just me spitballing rn, but it's somewhat of a similar model to what I'm running in the gods of TBR canon.
